J: Hi, Daniel.

I do not know if it is me being hard-nosed, but the spiritual types go on about surrendering to this, that and the other, which to me seems wrong. You never hear of a physicist surrendering to a theory or a philosopher surrendering to a philosophy.

Rather they have direct knowledge of their subject and are secure in this knowledge. Hence with Vedanta it is not a case of surrender, but being safe in the knowledge of who we are, and that our true self is limitless awareness.

Daniel: I say screw the spiritual types! There ain't nothing spiritual about spiritual! A genuine spiritual type is a mind which acts from a place of fullness rather than for fullness.

Surrender naturally happens when self-knowledge is applied because it becomes so damn obvious that everything gets taken care of, always.

When self-knowledge of your true identify as actionless, always-full awareness is direct/firm, neither surrender or unsurrender is of a concern. Why? Because you are free from both push and pull. You are free from everything. Full stop.

J: Hi, Daniel.

Many thanks for your help with my latest flurry of questions. When you look around and see many of spurious claims and dodgy definitions, one really starts to appreciate ShiningWorld. I really appreciate the logic and reason behind your posts.

Daniel: Telling me, J!

Take it easy.
